

- Since the intensity of sunlight is lost as the inverse square of the distance, only a very small fraction of the sun's power reaches Earth.
- To increase this fraction we put a device very close to the sun to absorb the sunlight intensity there and focus all that intensity into a laser beam. Now there are no wavefronts that lose intensity as the inverse square of the distance. All the intensity that was absorbed by the device is conserved!